

DragStrip

This doesn't come with the installation; it is what you end up with when you save your DragStrip panels.

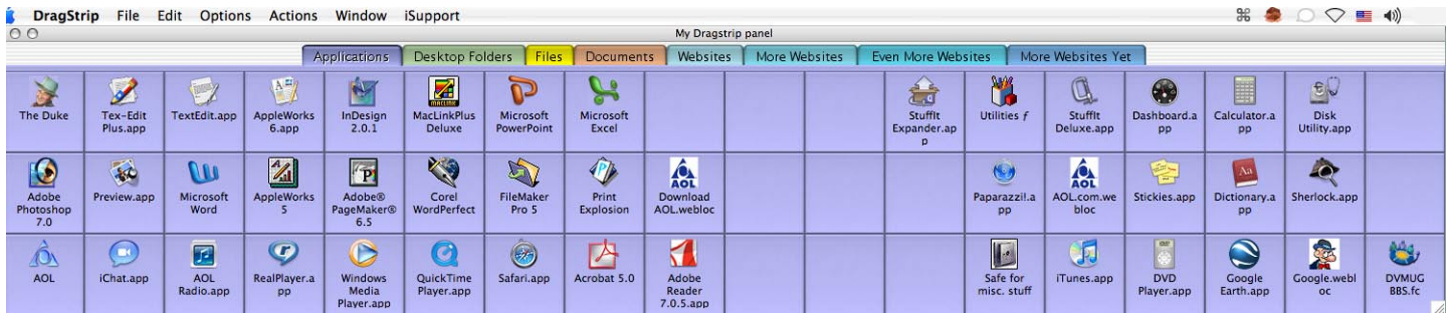

This is what you get when you install DragStrip. On the dock, it looks like this ↓

Since DragStrip is really a program of aliases, you need folders with your original items before you can start making the aliases. Of course, even before you begin setting up DragStrip, you already have many items in folders: your programs, utilities, and files.

Next is my original panel. Although you can choose your own colors, I am pretty sure that I used the default ones for my first four panels.

These are my most-used programs. The beauty of this program is that you have complete control of where everything goes.

You may end up with a completely different scheme than the one I devised for myself.

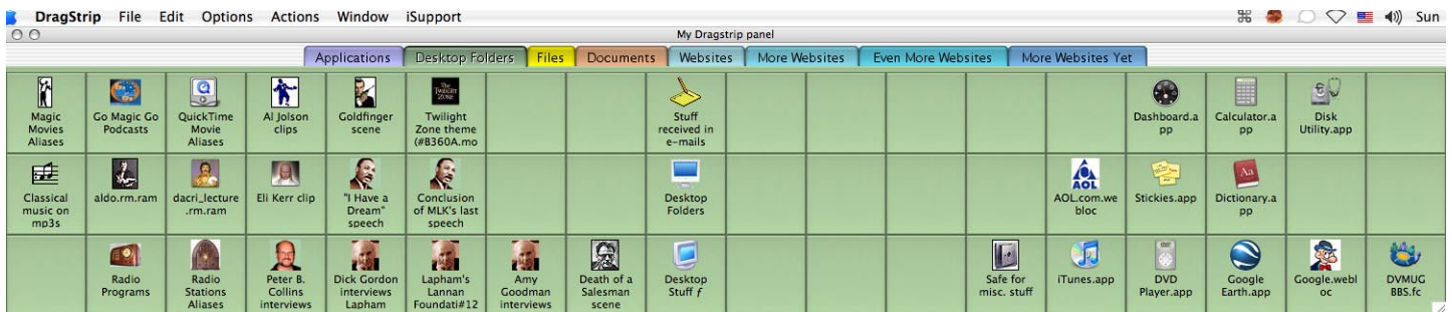

This would be a good time to point out that your panel can have as many or as few cells across and down as you choose. Since I have a twenty-inch monitor, my panel is wider than it was on my old computer.

Also, your panels may be placed horizontally or vertically anywhere on your desktop. I have placed mine at the top of my desktop.

Most of these items appear on the first four panels. Some of them appear on every panel.

That is because one item may appear as many times as you wish. You have complete control over the program.

These are fairly miscellaneous items that at one time were scattered all over my desktop.

The two buttons labeled "Desktop Folder" contain many original items whose aliases show up on other panels.

This is what my desktop looks like (minus the usual clutter that keeps accumulating on it). To accommodate Dragstrip and the Radio Station aliases folder which is always open, I have had to squeeze my desktop picture to the lower righthand corner of my screen.

These folders reside in a folder I keep inside my hard drive (named HAL).

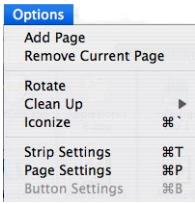

Some folders contain two or three items; others contain many items.

Inside one of my "Desktop Folder" folders I keep all the weblocs (along with two or three folders that show up on my second panel).

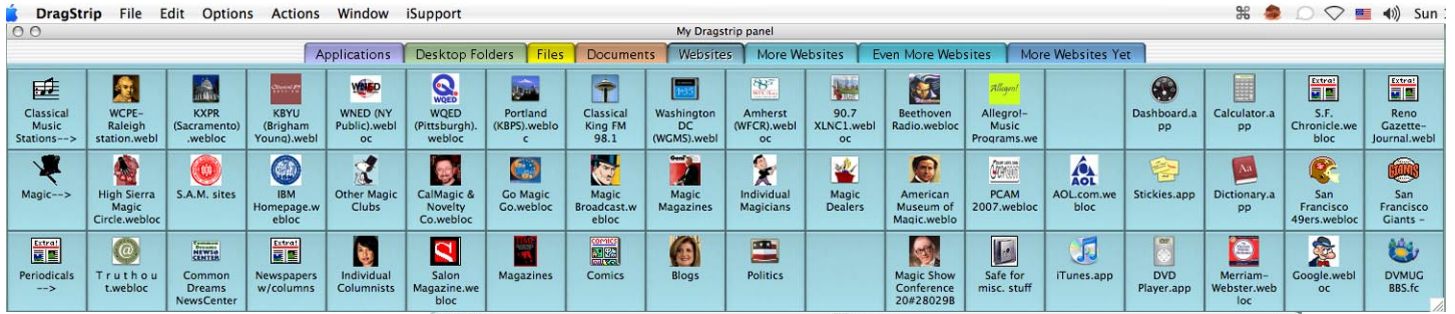

NOTE: Without the icons, these weblocs would not be nearly as helpful as they are.

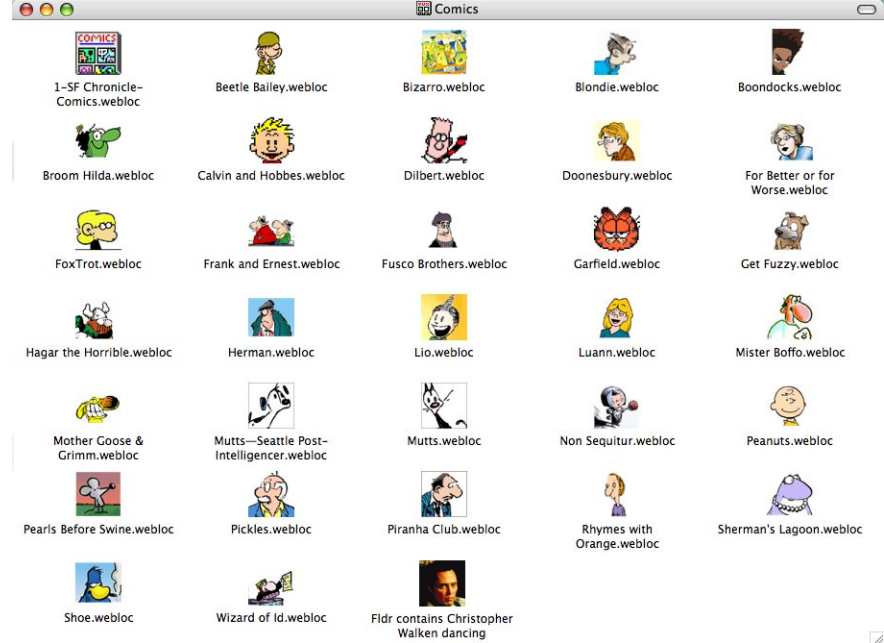

Once your DragStrip is up and running, the Options window allows you to fiddle around with colors, sizes, and location of the panels.

The Page Settings are where you go to change colors of panels.

When I click the Comics button, this window opens up here.

These contain all the cartoons which appear in the San Francisco Chronicle—plus a few others. The ones I read here daily are the ones that The Chronicle does not carry any-more.

When I miss a day of buying The Chronicle, I read them all.

Too much spare time on my hands.
